

Abstract

A printed circuit board includes a power layer for use in providing electrical power to circuit components and a ground layer for use in carrying electrical current away from the circuit components. A loss element connects electrically between the power layer and ground layer to suppress electrical noise caused by changes in current flow in the circuit components.

5